In the summer of 1884, Mr. Pabor, in an article published in the Journal of Commerce, Denver, wrote as follows: I do not think I am indulging in wild flights of imagination. I look about me and in the work of the present year I see the promise of the future. One hundred and ten acres of orchard lands set to trees this spring, point like an unerring index to the coming thousands of acres yet to be planted. The trees show a vigorous growth, though taken from alien soil and set in raw valley land, broken for the first time this spring. The vines and the bushes take kindly to this virgin soil. Three months ago I slept upon the floor of the one cabin dotting the then solitary waste. The moonlight crept through the chinks in the log walls, and the spring wind whistled around. Each had weird suggestions to the senses, bor n of the experiences of the past, and of the hopes for the future. For ages the Indians had control of this broad demense of rich land--to what end? The blackened trunks...
