Excerpt from Quarterly Journal of Microscopical Science, Vol. 8: With Illustrations on Wood and Stone Starch, from its physiological importance, remarkable structural peculiarities, and general diffusion through the vegetable kingdom, has been a favourite subject of investigation with physiologists and microscopists. However, notwithstanding the attention which has been devoted to its structure and development, it is acknowledged by the greatest physiologists to be known but little of. (See Mr. Busk's paper on Starch Granules, in the number of the Quarterly Journal of Microscopical Science for April, 1853.) There are, doubtless, intrinsic difficulties attending the investigation of this substance, but these have been very much augmented by the principle on which the examination has been conducted, namely, the cellular hypothesis. If this hypothesis had been in itself correct, and admissible as a basis of explanation of the facts connected with the structure and mode of formation of the starch granule, it ought, considering the amount of talent and ingenuity which have been employed in its application to these inquiries, to have thrown more light upon these much disputed, and as yet entirely unsettled questions. After this apology for thus differing from the high and almost universally credited authorities of the present day, I shall proceed to explain on a new principle - one strictly mechanical in its immediate operation - the principle of molecular coalescence, - those points connected with the structure and development of starch granules, by which physiologists and botanists have been so long puzzled. In this paper the same train of reasoning will be employed, and the same experimental data adduced, as in my last paper, that on the Structure and Mode of Formation of...
